Megapinger Review...

A couple of weeks ago I was happy to receive a review copy of MegaPinger from the Mattseh at the WickedFire Forums. Fast forward a couple weeks, and I've finally had a chance to put it through the tests and see what it's like for pinging massive amounts of links quickly, and efficiently.

What came in the file?

An executable, some text files, the license, and a pretty boring Readme file. I understand this program was made by a programmer, so documentation will by default be lackluster; however the documentation for this is pretty much nonexistent. If you don't know what you're doing I could see this getting a bit confusing (and, from some of the comments in the forum thread for the program, it's apparent that it is). But, if you

First Impressions

First off, I must say the threading is incredible. It did bog down my computer a little bit when I would put it up to 100+ threads, but that's fine if doing it overnight and nothing else is running. When running with more than 10 threads, I did experience problems in Ableton Live and Reason though, so it is something to note. Especially since I'm running on a Quad Core with 4GB of Ram.

What's It Do?

So, what's the program all about? Simple really, you load into it a list of your links, and optionally some spun titles, and it will run through your list and submit them to the common services out there to hopefully aid you in getting quick and relevant backlinks (depending on your titles, and submissions of course).

Does It Support Proxies?

The other great thing about this program is the option of using proxies. I used scrapebox to sort my list of proxies, and then I just loaded the same file in MegaPinger and was instantly sending my pings out through proxies instead of direct to the site from my lowly cable modem. Great stuff.

First Run

I tested it out on some small link lists, and everything worked great including the title spinning for submissions. Then I decided I should put it to the real test, and I loaded up my list of all links from the past little while (around ~4400 of them). This told me there was about 398912 pings to be sent out, and gave me a fancy little progress bar.

Then I loaded my list of proxies into Megapinger and set it to run. These proxies are kept in a simple text file in the MegaPinger directory. Along with the failed and succeeded ping lists text file that you can refer to later.

I let this run, and kept an eye on the CPU usage and memory usage, and it was pretty constant to what this screenshot shows below.

Image Name	User Name	CPU	Memory (Private Working S...	Description
firefox.exe *32	Matt	00	212,868 K	Firefox
TweetDeck.exe *32	Matt	00	190,164 K	TweetDeck.exe
MegaPinger.exe *32	Matt	02	145,856 K	MegaPinger.exe
sidebar.exe	Matt	00	97,984 K	Windows Desktop Gadgets

This process took about 24 hours to run, if I kept it down at 50 threads. When I increased it I was up to about 300 pings a minute, so the time went drastically down. So far so good. Much quicker than any other pinger I've used and I'm sure I could have tossed it up to 500 threads and got upwards of 800 pings a minute with fast proxies, but I didn't have time to test that much.

Problems

I did notice a slight issue, that if you pause the pinger and start it again, for some reason it would double my 'left to be pinged' list, and thusly re-ping all the sites it had already done. Minor annoyance since I don't really pause MegaPinger, but something to note.

As of this writing a support ticket, and message has been sent on the forum to Mattseh without a reply (but it hasn't been very long! ).

Overall

MegaPinger is a Great product with a great price. Aside from the small bug mentioned above I don't see why you shouldn't be using this to ping your links.

I'm not going to get into whether ping is worth it or not, there are many sides to that argument, which you guys can discuss in the comments 😊

Why It's Important to Meet Other Affil...

A couple summers ago, I met this cat at Affiliate Summit East. Since then we've talked more on the Internet, and even partnered on a few ventures and had some moderate success. We also met up occasionally at conferences too. Last week, he happened to have some time available so he came up to chill in Canada for about 9 days. My friends and I took him out to some local clubs, and showed him a bit of the scenery by going to my cottage up in Quebec. Had some camp fires, he did some fishing with a friend of mine, and generally shot the shit.

Basically he got the full Canadian experience. Including but not limited to real beer, seeing bears and deer in the wild north, eating poutine, French pornography on TV at all hours of the day and of course Canadian Cigarettes.

Now, you may be wondering, why is this important?

It's Simple, Really...

Face to face conversations generally mean much more than any electronic mediums – especially when building business relationships. Why do you think that people still fly from New York to Tokyo to meet business associates, sometimes even for seemingly unimportant meetings? That's right, it's because more can get discussed, drawn on napkins, explained with hand gestures or even reading micro expressions in person than online. All of this obviously leads to stronger relationships, and ultimately more money down the road.

While it's easy to converse using instant messaging, telephone and other electronic methods they aren't always the best. Talking face to face, often leads to more in-depth discussions, and aides in the level of trust that each person or business entity gives to each other. Not to mention the fact that it seems every cat in this industry has ADD or ADHD, so jumping back and forth from topic to topic in real life can be easier to follow than online with the constant scroll. It sounds silly, but if you think about it I think you'll probably realize it's true for you too – why else would you pay all that money to attend the various conferences?

I do think that electronic communications are great for quick 'hey, what was that offer again' type things, but when getting right down to discussing business more can be accomplished in 2 hours of talking over beer than often can be done with 10 hours of IRC or Instant Messaging.

I think we got more conducted in 9 days, than we had for the past 2 to 3 months online. For real.

Why did I write this post? Because I think that many in the industry, especially the younger folk take face to face meetings for granted, and would prefer everything to be electronic. When I was younger, I remember my dad telling me to 'make friends with your banker, don't do everything electronically' and that advice has saved me thousands of dollars. The same principle applies to affiliates or any business really. Getting to know someone in real life is better than just being a client number or contact on MSN.

Might be old, but was new to me and as an avid fan of infomercials (sadly, I think I recognized nearly every clip from this) this was pretty good.
